GAELIC CONVERSATION

AND

PRONUNCIATION,

WITH

VOCABULARIES, DIALOGUES, PHRASES, AND LETTER FORMS.

By L. Macbean,

Author of "Elementary Lessons in Gaelic," "Songs and Hymns of the Gael," &c.

SECOND EDITION.

STIRLING:

Eneas Mackay, Murray Place.

1905.

PREFACE.

This book is published chiefly to supply a need felt by visitors to the Highlands, the want of an English-Gaelic handbook of phrases and dialogues, in which English sentences are followed by their Gaelic equivalents. In preparing the dialogues the author was guided to some extent by the numerous phrasebooks of other European languages, but the peculiar circumstances of the Highlands and the Highland tongue necessitated the introduction of new subjects and the adoption of new forms. It was also necessary on account of the large number of idioms used conversationally in both Gaelic and English, to add a pretty long list of idiomatic phrases. The vocabularies, which occupy the first fifty pages of the book (with the exception of some proper names), consist entirely of words in everyday use. As it is difficult to represent the finer shades of Gaelic vowel-sounds by any system of phonetics, it is recommended that the learner should get the pronunciation viva voce wherever practicable. When that is not possible, the Gaelic should be read from the centre column, the third column being referred to only when the pronunciation is doubtful. In this way the student will soon acquire the habit of reading correctly from the ordinary Gaelic spelling. It is hoped that this little volume will be found useful as a handbook for strangers in the Highlands, as a book of reference for Highlanders themselves, and as the best introduction to Gaelic for those who wish to become acquainted with that language.

GAELIC CONVERSATION.

TABLE OF SOUNDS.

In the orthoëpy given in the vocabularies, the vowels used represent the following sounds:—

1.—a	-	short as in fat - -	fat
2.—â	-	long like a in far - -	fâr
3.—e	-	short as in wet - -	wet
4.—ê	-	long as in where - -	whêre
5.—á	-	short and acute as in fate	fáte
6.—ā	-	longer than a in fame -	fāme
7.—i	-	short as in wit - -	wit
8.—ĕ	-	short as in we - -	wĕ
9.—ee	-	long as in wee - -	wee
10.—o	-	short as in cot - -	cot
11.—ô	-	long as in cord - -	côrd
12.—ó	-	short and acute as in photo	phóto
13.—ō	-	long as in fold - -	fōld
14.—u	-	short as in shun - -	shun
15.—û	-	long as in jeûne - -	zhûn
16.—ū	-	short like ou in would -	wūd
17.—oo	-	long like ooe in wooed -	wooed

The English i as in fire is represented by aĕ.

The consonants are pronounced as in English, with the following exceptions:—

Ch is not hard like k, nor soft as in chase, but always guttural, as in loch, trachle.

Dd, tt, ll, and nn represent a very soft sound of these consonants, in forming which the tongue, near the tip, touches the upper gum.

Ly and ny represent a peculiar modification of the sounds of l and n, effected by placing the centre of the tongue against the roof of the mouth when pronouncing these consonants. The l is rather softer than in million, and the n softer than the first n in pinion.

The digraphs in the above table practically represent simple vowel sounds, the second vowels being very faintly heard. Before the labials b, f, m, and p, however, i is more distinctly heard. Examples—caib, cnaip.

The single vowels are divided into two classes—the broad, a, o, u, and the small, e, i.

ao, which is a single vowel sound, is always long, like u in purr, pronounced long. Example—maor.

a and o. when followed by ll or nn, are usually pronounced au and ou. Examples—fann, fonn.

a, in an unaccented syllable, or before dh or gh, has the sound of u in but ; Examples—coma, lagh.

e, in an unaccented syllable, is pronounced as in cover. Example—duine.

o, followed by b, g, m, p, or dh, is pronounced as in canto. Examples—gob, bog, crodh, lomadh.

In the diphthongs and triphthongs èa ; eà ; eò, eòì ; eó, eóì ; eo, eoi ; ìa, iai ; iù, ìùì ; iu, iui ; ua, uai, the first and second vowels are heard. Examples—gèadh, feàrr, eòlas, feòil ; Eóghainn, leómhann ; deoch, geoic ; iar, fiaire ; iùl, ciùil ; iuchair, tiuighe ; uan, uaine. Before b, f, m, and p the final i is also heard. Examples—fuaim, uaip.

eà, èa, eò, and eòì are rarely used.

Most vowels are somewhat nasal when in contact with m, mh, or n.

B is pronounced harder than in English. Example—obair.

C before a broad vowel hard, as in can ; before a small vowel, as in came ; never soft, like s ; when final chk. Examples—cas, céum, ioc.

D with a broad vowel a little softer than in English, produced by placing the tongue near the tip in contact with the teeth or between the teeth. Example—da

D with a small vowel like j or dj in English. Example—dé.

F as in English.

G always hard, as in got or get ; when final hard like k. Examples—gu, ge, bog.

H never appears in Gaelic except along with some other consonant or followed by a hyphen.

L with a broad vowel, like lth in although. Example—làn.

L preceded by a small vowel, or initial followed by a small vowel in the past tense of verbs or in the word le and its derivatives—hard as in English. Example—gil, lean, leam.

L, initial with a small vowel, liquid—nearly as in mi*ll*ion, formed by placing the surface of the tongue about the centre to the roof of the mouth. Example—lion.

Ll with a broad vowel, thick almost like lth. Example—call.

Ll with a small vowel, like l in million. Example—fill.

M as in English, but more nasal. Example—cam.

N as in English. Example—bàn.

N initial followed by a small vowel (except in nis and the verb ni and past tense of verbs)—liquid, nearly as in pi*n*ion. Example—neo.

Nn with a broad vowel, formed by placing the tongue near the tip against the teeth. Example—Bann.

Nn with a small vowel, nearly as in pi*n*ion. Example—Binn.

P as in English, but after am almost as soft as B. When final, it is more breathy—hp. Examples—Pill, am pill? Cnap.

R with a broad vowel, as in rod. Example—ro.

R with a small vowel, as in Arian Example—ri.

S with a broad vowel, as in English. Example—Sàl.

S with a small vowel (and in the word so) is equal to English sh. ception—is.

T with a broad vowel, formed not with hard stiff tongue tip, but with a soft pressure of the tongue against the teeth. Example—ta.

T with a small vowel like ch in chase. Example—tinn.

After an, c is softened to g, and t to d, as—an cu; an tonn.

By adding h the consonants b, c, d, f, g, m, p, s, and t are modified, giving a breathy effect, called aspiration.

Bh like v in English.

Ch, guttural as in German, or in the Scotch wor l trachle.

Dh and gh with a broad vowel almost like gh in ugh, or g in the German word Tag; with a small vowel equal to y.

Fh is silent, except in the words, fhuair, fhein, and fhathast, where the h is heard.

Mh like v, but more nasal.

Ph like f.

Sh and th like h.

The consonants l, n, and r, are never aspirated.

Chd sounds like chk. Example—reachd.

Rt with a broad vowel is like rst; with a small vowel it sounds rsj. Examples—mart, beairt.

When l, n, or r is followed by b, g, m, or p, a vowel is heard between the two consonants. Thus, calg is pronounced calag; calpa, calapa; falbh, falabh; searg, searag; airm, airim.
